The fictional story goes like this...

“While visiting with a friend over coffee one morning, a young woman complained, “Every time my husband and I get into an argument, he gets historical!” The friend interrupted, “Don’t you mean hysterical?” The young woman replied, “No, I mean historical. He always brings up the past.”

Obviously, the aforementioned husband could not forgive the wife for whatever happened in the past. To repeatedly bring up the past identifies an inability to forgive, thereby weakening a relationship.

Relationships endure when forgiveness is employed. Co-workers return to being “on the same page.” Friendships are saved. Spouses become one in the marriage again.

As it is so well known to those whose relationships have proven to endure the test of many years, “Forgiving requires people not to keep score.”

Don’t keep score! The winners in the game of life are those who truly forgive, then move forward with the person who is truly sorry for what he/she has done.

Peace,
Fr. Marc
