Twenty-First Sunday in Ordinary Time

The theological opposition between “flesh” and “Spirit” familiar to NT language encouraged the use of the “body”. Ignatius of Antioch habitually uses the expression “flesh of our Savior Jesus Christ” to define the Eucharist; while Justin Martyr uses both “flesh” and “body”. Just as Nicodemus thought of rebirth in a purely physical sense (John 3:4) and as the woman at the well first thought only of natural water (John 4:11), so now some of the Jews take the reference to Christ’s flesh literally. The Semitic figure of speech, “eat someone’s flesh,” which meant “to slander” (Ps 27:2), obviously did not contribute in helping them to understand. Neither do Jesus’ words in reply encourage any figurative understanding of his pronouncement; his reiteration only underscores the difficulty discerned in the flesh of the Son of Man: Since the Son of Man is he in whom God and mankind meet, it is fitting that Jesus should identify the Eucharist with himself as Son of Man.

Vigésimo Primer Domingo en el Tiempo Ordinario

La oposición teológica entre "carne" y "espíritu" familiar al lenguaje NT animó el uso del "cuerpo". Ignacio de Antioquía utiliza habitualmente la expresión "carne de nuestro Salvador Jesucristo" para definir la Eucaristía; mientras que Justin Martyr usa tanto "carne" como "cuerpo". Al igual que Nicodemo pensó en el renacimiento en un sentido puramente físico (Juan 3:4) y como la mujer en el bien primero pensó solamente en el agua natural (Juan 4:11), así que ahora algunos de los judíos toman la referencia a la carne de Cristo literalmente. La figura semítica del discurso, "come la carne de alguien," que significó "calumniar" (PS 27:2), obviamente no contribuyeron a ayudarles a entender. Ni las palabras de Jesús en respuesta alientan ninguna comprensión figurativa de su pronunciamiento; su reiteración sólo subraya la dificultad discernida en la carne del hijo del hombre: puesto que el hijo del hombre es aquel en quien Dios y la humanidad se reúnen, es apropiado que Jesús identifique la Eucaristía consigo mismo como hijo del hombre.
