THIRTY-SECOND SUNDAY IN ORDINARY TIME

TO LABOR AND TO WAIT

It is easy to understand why Jesus used the image wedding feast to describe the Kingdom of God. In Jewish culture, a wedding feast is an extended period of joyous celebration, an occasion when one drinks in happiness and life. Significantly, Jesus' first miracle happened in a wedding feast in Cana where he changed water in wine.

Jesus' own story, addressed to his disciples, is called that parable of the Ten Bridesmaids. Like everybody else joining in the wedding feast, the bridesmaids know their specific function in the celebration. They will escort the bridegroom to fetch the bride, and eventually bring her to the house of the bridegroom's father where the ceremony is normally held. Usually, the bridesmaids do not know the exact hour of the ceremony because families of both parties discuss the dowry to be given in honor of the bride. Apparently, the length of the negotiation and the value of the dowry correspond to the importance or desirability of the bride.

Thus, the bridesmaids have to be alert and anticipate the coming of the bridegroom. They must be ready to escort the bridegroom and his party along the road that is often unfamiliar terrain, dark and dangerous. When the wise bridesmaids in the parable refuse to share their oil with the foolish ones, the wise virgins are not being selfish but opt only to be practical. They know their crucial role as bridesmaids, and they understand what their duty entails. They make an intelligent estimate of the quantity of oil sufficient for the entire length or duration of the procession.

At the wedding feast in Cana, Jesus averts what could otherwise be a shameful experience for the couple whose banquet runs out of wine, when Jesus turns water into wine. In the parable of the Ten Bridesmaids, Jesus draws the possible disaster that could happen to the party of the bridegroom if there is not enough oil to light the torches. The procession, expected to bring exhilarating joy, could turn into a miserable and heavy funeral.

The foolish bridesmaids knew their duty all long but turned negligent. The disciples will have to learn how to put "oil" in their torches, to allow the steadfast ripening of their faith. The disciples will grow in faith not simply because they wish to lead crowds safely along the journey, but ultimately because of their love for the Bridegroom whose wedding feast they wish to celebrate in exhilaration and joy.
