EIGHTH SUNDAY IN ORDINARY TIME

Seeing Our Own Blindness

Other people naturally see us better than we see ourselves, especially externally. But even internally, at times, when we do expect to know ourselves better, we fail to see certain things in us—until people point them out to us. Hypocrisy is the readiness to see what is wrong with others but the failure to acknowledge our own defects. We may detect what is wrong with us, but we do not want to face or accept it because it may lead us to painful change or swallowing of our pride.

The cure for hypocrisy and/or “blind spots” lies in a healthy regular examination of ourselves, in allowing others to give us feedback or mirror our defects to us, and in learning to be mindful of them. Light comes when we present ourselves as we truly are, when we come out of the darkness of our pretensions.

The Gospel illustrates how hypocrisy presents itself. The imagery and the theme revolve around “seeing and not seeing.” The hypocrite or pretentious person readily sees the speck, the tiny dirt, in the eye of another, while missing what Jesus calls the “log” on the person’s own eye. The small defect in others is noticed but not the barricading log in one’s own eye.

Examples abound from everyday life. We can easily criticize the lack of cleanliness in our neighbor’s yard but fail to see the garbage piling up behind our home, or perhaps the “moral garbage” that our family may be heaping up. We can show ourselves to be “crusaders of poverty” but cannot rid of our many possessions, or champions of social justice but do not give just compensation to our employees or domestic helpers.
