CATHOLIC SCHOOLS IN COLUMBUS, 1855

By Sister Vincent Peth, S.N.D. de N.

(The following is an excerpt from "A History of the Sisters of Notre Dame in Columbus, the First Fifty Years, 1855-1905," written by Sister Vincent Peth. Further issues will give more from the history.)

Two schools served the Catholics in Columbus in 1855. Catholic education had begun in 1843 when Father William Schonat, pastor of the first parish, Saint Remigius, established a school temporarily in a small frame building on the Bauman property at Third and Friend (now Main) Streets. The following year, a small frame schoolhouse was built next to the stone church on the corner of Fifth and Rich Streets (1). Most of the Catholics in those early days of the parish were German or of German descent, but by 1849 there was a growing number of English-speaking Catholics whose children could not understand the lessons given in the German-taught parish school. In that year, the parish completed a fine new church dedicating it to the Holy Cross rather than to Saint Remigius (2). Father Casper Borgess was the newly appointed pastor. This energetic, twenty-three-year-old priest recognized the need for more classroom space and asked Archbishop Purcell (3), in whose diocese Columbus lay, for permission to use the old stone church as a school. The English, (that is, the English-speaking—chiefly of Irish descent) he said, were too poor to build a school of their own and the German children alone numbered over one hundred (4). It seems, then, there were two "schools" or rooms established in the stone church; the German school, and the English school, though the latter did not prosper because, Borgess wrote, "I find it impossible to make them [the Irish] take to heart the importance!" (5) After two years the English-speaking Catholics were formed into a separate congregation under the care of Father John Furlong, and, after a few months, under that of Father James Meagher. While the new congregation planned and built their church, services were held for them at Holy Cross at times which did not interfere with the German congregation. In 1853, their church, Saint Patrick's, was completed; in 1854 their school was built (6).

The decision to build a school at Saint Patrick's followed a sharp controversy aroused throughout the state over the 1853 school legislation. For the first time citizens of Ohio were to be taxed for the support of the "common" or public school system. Objections were raised. Purcell led the Catholic opposition with a petition to the legislature that Catholics be allowed to use their tax money for their own schools. In the spring of 1853 he published frequent articles in the diocesan paper, The Catholic Telegraph, explaining and defending the Catholic position. Often these were in answer to... articles printed in the Cincinnati Gazette. Catholics, however, were a small minority and their requests were overridden. As a result, Ohio Catholics were faced with the now familiar situation of supporting two school systems. The first Provincial Council of Cincinnati, held in May, 1855, issued a pastoral letter in which Christian parents were told: "...above all, encourage the erection and support of parochial schools in which religious principles are inculcated along with the elements of learning....The erection of Catholic schools is, in many respects, as important an object as the building of new churches." (7)

Religious Tolerance

Contrary to expectation, the controversy over the school question did not lead to an outbreak of bigotry in Columbus, nor did the city experience an anti-Catholic movement as did Cincinnati (8). Had it done so, Columbus would have been an unpleasant place in 1855 for religious women venturing an establishment. There seems to be as little real evidence of strong bigotry in 1855 as there was on the day back in 1859 when Bishop Purcell, having come to administer confirmation in Columbus for the first time, preached that evening in the Senate Chamber of the old State House a sermon on the Holy Trinity, or in 1840 when he lectured each evening in the Courthouse during a week’s visit (9). When the school bill was being hotly debated, the Daily Ohio Statesman, the leading Democratic newspaper, reprinted from the Catholic Telegraph Register the whole of the archbishop's letter to Catholics "to show the grounds the Catholics take on the subject" (10). Another issue of the Statesman stated that Catholics, as Democrats, had a right to oppose the new bill, adding: "The Catholics, it appears to us, have not a whit more bigotry than a great many of their assailants; and they are not half as dangerous to freedom, because they have better political principles, and a great deal more sense" (11).

The Ohio State Journal, on the other hand, regretted the Catholic Telegraph’s arraying itself against the school bill and warned the Catholics against "indulging in abuse of our common school system" (12).

There was Know-Nothing activity in Columbus during 1855. Incidents of stone-throwing in late May and on July 4 involved nativist prejudice against German groups in the city and were deplored by respectable citizens (13), but evidence of anti-Catholicism did not appear in this nor in events later in the summer. On July 13 and 14 the new Fusion (Republican) Party, of which the Know-Nothings were a faction, met in Columbus to nominate a slate of candidates for state offices. The Know-Nothings could not tolerate this man who had cultivated German support and befriended abolitionists; therefore, they held their own convention on August 9 to replace Chase (14). On August 27, the very day of the arrival of the Sisters, a mass meeting was held at City Hall to ratify the work of the convention in nominating the aging former governor, Allen B. Trimble (15). In all accounts of these events there is no evidence of religious bigotry, and even the nativist prejudice is lost in the stop-Chase movement.

Columbus editors, however, manifested ignorance concerning things Catholic. The Ohio State Journal on August 13, 1855, two weeks before the arrival of the Sisters, ran a two-column front-page reprint of an article from the New York Evening Mirror on "The Founder of Jesuitism." Herein was revealed the man "in whose soul surged the elements of a fiery, yet disciplined world ambition, a haughty contempt for the masses of mankind — save the use of them — a profound hypocrisy... a subtle daring, etc. etc." who designed "a politico-religious organization to save the Church and glorify himself and his work." The article worked down to the melancholy fact: "Even now the world sits under its shadow" (16).

Even though the article was front-page material, it was an isolated piece. There were no letters to the editor for or against on succeeding days. Nearly two weeks later, a short article in the same vein appeared on the editorial page (17), but this, too, was followed by no comment. The Articles take on some significance, though not much, when one reads in an early eyewitness account of the arrival of the Sisters, that it was whispered that the black-robed ladies were Jesuits in disguise (18).

The Request for Religious Teachers

As early as 1849, the "black-robed ladies" had been requested as teachers for the Catholic children by Casper Borgess. Unfortunately he applied to Sister Louise at the same time that his predecessor at Holy Cross, Father Henry Damien Juncker, requested Sisters for his school at Emmanuel parish in Dayton. Since there were not enough Sisters to begin work in both places, Sister Louise sought the advice of Archbishop Purcell. He felt the Columbus foundation should be made and wrote hastily, "Columbus not Dayton is to be begun first." But the Dutch-borne superior, whose mastery of English was not complete, read a pause after "not" and obediently sent the Sisters to Dayton (19).

However, Father Borgess kept renewing at intervals his request for German Sisters for his school. He was promised them in 1855. Then he asked Father Meagher to ask for Sisters for Saint Patrick School; the four Sisters then could form a community. This Meagher was reluctant to do since his new parish had such heavy debts; but when he learned that the Sisters would require no salary, but would be compensated only by what the pupils could pay as a stipend, he agreed (20).

From here on arrangements for the Sisters' coming seem to have been left to Father Meagher, probably because when the time drew near, Sister Louise found that again there were not enough German Sisters to send to take over classes at Holy Cross.
