What does the phrase "consubstantial with the Father" in the Creed mean?

If you'd recited the Creed before the Second Vatican Council in the mid-1960s, the line you indicate would have read: "Of one substance with the Father." After Vatican II and before 2011, that phrase was: "One in being with the Father." The Greek word translated all three ways is homoousion, "single essence." The Latin word is consubstantialis, bringing us to the current translation, consubstantial—a word you probably won't hear in any context other than reciting the Creed. Jesus puts it more elegantly when he declares in John's gospel: "The Father and I are one." He makes a similar proposal to Philip, when the disciple innocently asks to see the Father: "Whoever has seen me has seen the Father." The first Christian leader to use the term consubstantial was Origen (185-254). He insisted: "There is no dissimilarity whatever between the Son and the Father." He further declared "the power of the Trinity is one and the same" by quoting Saint Paul: "There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit; there are diversities of administrations, but the same Lord; and there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God who works all in all."
