Overcoming the Consumerist Model

Unfortunately, our society is constantly conditioning us to associate love and happiness with feelings. It's a consumer society, where feelings rule. Why? Because advertisers can manipulate feelings - with the right image and music, they can make us feel good about a product even if we don't need it.

So, if we are conditioned to make decisions based mostly on feelings, advertisers can convince us to buy a product just by stirring up the right feelings. And since feelings by their nature are always changing, like the weather, as soon as we get tired of one product, a smart advertiser can make us feel good about another one. But if we give in to this model of life, soon everything becomes a product, disposable when it no longer gives us nice feelings - religion, marriage, truth, even children.

St Paul invites us to build on a firmer, deeper foundation, that of Christian, Christ-like love. Think of a mother taking care of her sick child. She stays up all night, she watches, she worries, she cleans and feeds and comforts. She exhausts herself. How does she feel in the midst of all that? She feels rotten. And yet, she wouldn't have it any other way.

Think of soldiers who love their country. Do they feel good when they're on a forced march through sleet and snow and enemy fire, night after night? Do they feel comfortable when they have to stay on duty for twelve hours in a sandy foxhole under the desert sun?

Feelings have nothing to do with it.

Human maturity comes when we learn to live on a deeper level, when we learn to love. Love means giving ourselves to others, and in the first place to God, regardless of feelings; it means being faithful to what is true and right, no matter how we feel.

A public school teacher entered his classroom a little early one morning and was shocked to discover several of the students on their knees in a corner. "Just what do you think you're doing?" he demanded. One of the boys shouted back, "We're playing craps." "Thank God," he replied. "I was afraid you were praying."
