

SEVENTH SUNDAY IN ORDINARY TIME

FEBRUARY 23, 2020

From the Priests' Desks

Dear Brothers and Sisters of Sacred Heart,

Perhaps the most difficult and challenging teaching of Jesus is the doctrine of unrestricted love which appears in today's Gospel: "I say to you: Love your enemies, pray for those who persecute you." The problem with this teaching, of course, is that it seems to go against the instinct for self-preservation; and so, Christians have always been at odds about its true meaning and about how it can best be lived out. Is it meant to be taken literally or as an ideal: is it realistic or the product of wishful thinking?

Certainly, in regard to unrestricted love the Old Testament does not measure up to the New. "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," shouts the OT. And yet even this seemingly harsh commandment represented an advance over the morality of earlier times, which placed no limit on retribution, on getting even for an offense. The law of the ancient world permitted any measure a person might regard as necessary to restore their honor and protect their rights; and so, might be translated: "A head for an eye, and a life for a tooth."

The Old Testament insight that the punishment should suit the offense established that norm of strict justice which we take for granted today as the basis of democratic society and of all community life. And yet even the Old Testament went beyond the requirements of strict justice and called for a more benevolent and merciful approach toward others. "Take no revenge and cherish no grudge against your fellow countrymen," states today's first reading from the Book of Leviticus. "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." Much of what Jesus said during his own ministry, then, was drawn from the best of Jewish tradition: from the growing awareness of his people about how they were to relate to each other. What was new and unique in the teaching of Jesus was that he took the command of love for countrymen and universalized it to include not just Jews but all people. The neighbor to be forgiven, moreover, was not only my friend but my enemy as well. For the Jews of Jesus' day this meant that they could no longer use nationality as an excuse for hating foreigners: for us today it means that we cannot simply use like and dislike as a basis for how we treat others—at least, not if we take the message of Jesus seriously. We are called to let go of resentment and forget about revenge.

And the reason for forgiveness is not primarily an emotional one: "because we are all brothers and sisters" but a theological one: because this is the way that God acts. God forgives all; God loves all equally. Jesus does not reject the category of enemy. He does not deny that we can have enemies—as individuals and as a community—rather he demands that we love and forgive them in spite of the fact that they are enemies. And herein precisely lays the difficulty and challenge of his message. "Love your enemies," he said, "do good to those who hate you; bless those who curse you; and pray for those who maltreat you." Far from being a formula for liberation, these admonitions seem to suggest that the ideal Christian should be something of a slave; that he should be passive, tolerant of abuse, and shut his eyes to injustice—in short, to become everyone's doormat. In today's violent and dangerous world, it sounds like a formula to commit suicide, or at least a guarantee of martyrdom.

And yet if one looks at the life of Jesus one finds nothing of a submissive, fearful, or timid spirit. Rather, he constantly took the initiative in criticizing the failures of his contemporaries, speaking out against the injustices of his society, and defending the rights of the poor and exploited. Was this something of a double standard, with Jesus himself playing the role of the lion, while advising his disciples to play the role of the lamb? Perhaps not. For if one looks closely at the Gospel, he will discover that its central thrust is not that the weak will inherit the earth, but rather that the generous shall inherit the earth; and this generosity is to spring not from weakness or timidity, but from strength of spirit and of character; not from fear but from self-assurance in doing what is right. It was this spirit of generosity which made Jesus willing to share all that he had, to give away everything—even his own life—so that others might be filled, so that others might be healed. It was and is this generosity which leads our God to forgive all—the just and the unjust, the good and the bad—not because he is indifferent to the way people act but because God sees all as his children, the work of his hands.

As believers in the truth of Christ's message, it is our continuing task to imitate the example of his generosity, to overcome those obstacles of selfishness and egoism that place limits and conditions on our concern for others; to stretch the boundaries of our definition of neighbor and countryman; and to ask our God continually to give us hearts that are courageous enough to forgive, and big enough to love as God himself has first loved us.
